Breaking Dawn

Chapter 1 by Hannah Rinchich

It was a cold, dark night in the woods. A gentle breeze blew through the collection of snow-coated pines and caused some snow to drop down onto a girl's head. She paused for a second, looking at all of her surroundings frantically. Then she began running once again.

What could cause a girl to be so fearful?

Many things, my friend. Many. One thing though in particular that inspired fear in her young heart was her father.

Although Dawn's lived with her Aunt Barbara for quite a while, he still lurks in her dreams at night, lingering only a short period in the better ones while haunting her worst.

Even though Aunt Barbara is kind and loving woman, she cannot erase what damage her father has caused her. Sometimes she randomly screams out for help during the day or yells for her father to stop in her sleep. Sometimes she goes silent in the middle of a sentence. Other times she may curl up into a ball and start sobbing or rock back and forth in a corner. In the worst cases, Dawn runs out during the night and sits in the cold. She feels as if he's nearby and going to lunge at her. Her mind thinks maybe if she hides outside for a while, he'll give up trying to get her and leave her be a while longer. See more of Story Wars
